THE PC WAY TO TEACH FOREIGN LANGUAGES.

Now there's a way to turn any PC classroom into a language learning lab. Sony has combined its Virtuoso™ Instructional Control Software with Soloist™ Digital PC Comparative Recorder Software to create a fully digital Language Learning System. The software operates on Windows® based PCs and a local area network and requires no additional software or hardware other than quality headsets.

Unlike most legacy language learning systems, the Virtuoso and Soloist system uses digital technology exclusively, making it quicker and easier to access, retrieve, or archive audio, video, and data files.

The Virtuoso system incorporates all the real-time audio functions essential for student communications including: Monitoring, All Call, Group Call, Modeling, Random Pairing, and Conferencing. Sony's advanced audio compression technology provides excellent voice quality at low bit rates, minimizing the impact on the LAN. Teachers can work with students in teams, in groups, as an entire class, or with students working independently. And multi-teacher functionality enables simultaneous class instruction.

To add a cultural and visual dimension to language education, instructors can seamlessly integrate digital video into their teaching repertoire. In addition to remote control capabilities, the Virtuoso system also includes the ability to open and close audio, video, picture, text files, and web pages within the Soloist software application.

Computer supervisory control is built-in, enabling instructors to monitor student screens, share keyboard and mouse control with students, and share or blank student screens. And because it includes advanced evaluation tools such as the "Response Analyzer" and "Auto Test Editor", the Virtuoso system really makes the grade.

With all these flexible tools available in a system that easily installs in an existing PC network, the Virtuoso system is definitely the PC way to teach foreign languages.
